Read the following passage carefully:

One fine evening a holy saint was sitting in his cottage. A gigantic tough king entered his cottage. "Saint", he said, in an accustomed manner, "Tell me about heaven and hell." The saint looked up at the king and replied, "Teach you about heaven and hell? I cannot teach you anything!! You are a dishonor to your class of kings. Just get out of my sight and don't bother me."

Hearing this, the king was furious. He shook with rage, withdrew his sword and raised it, almost preparing to slay the saint. "That act is indicative to hell," said the saint softly. The king was overwhelmed. This little man had put his life at stake, just in order to make the king understand the essential difference. The king slowly put down his sword and bowed with gratitude. "That is what is heaven," said the saint gently.

This poem describes some of the unusual characteristics of the harbour seal.

As you walk along the ocean
And peer out toward the water
And you see a log that's floating—
Look again, it might be me.

Come right down into the harbor,
But be quick, I must keep moving.
I am one the orca's hunting,
And he frequently swims here.

Like the orca, I send signals,
Only mine sound much like clicking.
They bounce back with a clear message:
"Is it time to flee or eat?"

It would serve me if you showed them
How I dive into the ocean.
How the channels to my ears fill
And then serve me like a drum

That amplifies the slightest sound—
That's how I hear in water.
There's more that makes me special.
I can hear on land as well.

They have surely heard me talking
With my friends out on their shores.
Come and look across your harbor.
I'm here peeking. Can you see me?

Please be quick. I must keep moving.
Now you see me, now you don't.

An eminent bacteriologist, Dr. Hargobind Narula, went to the tropical rainforests of South America to study some new strains of disease causing bacteria. There, while carrying out his explorations, he came across a remote, uninhabited area and set up his camp there. A few months later he wrote to his friend.

“You are aware that the country around some parts of the Amazon is still partially explored. I had the occasion to spend a night in a small Indian village at a point where a certain tributary—the name and position of which I withhold—opens into the main river. There perched on a tree, I saw a dimorphodon, a pterodactyl, a flying reptile of the Jurassic period.”
